Computer Chips are becoming more like Human Brains

The idea behind the development of neuromorphic chips is to make them a bit more like us and in turn make computers better at navigating and modeling human behavior. These neuromorphic chips being developed by companies like Qualcomm are designed to perceive beyond their programming such as being able to process sensory data and react accordingly. It'll have a huge effect on robotics in the next few years and continue reshape the way we think of computers and our relationship with them.

Samsung Gear VR

Public speaking is now going to be fun. Many people have a fear of public speaking, and virtual public speaking simulator can help them to work through it in a safe space, and even assist with some simple visualization techniques. The scenarios will consist of three public situations, like school setting, office setting, and a business meeting. It will give users the chance to experience what it would be like to give a public speech/presentation, and from the safety and comfort of their own home which provides them the confidence to actually do it in real life.

Google's Contact Lenses with Blood Sugar Level Measurement

Google is taking their wearable technology ambitions even further with a smart contact lens. Along with sending Google+ notifications, its transmitters are used for an entirely different goal i.e., Monitoring Diabetics tears for glucose. These Lenses see google moving further into wearable technologies and rising over into healthcare technology.

Smart card

A smart card is a credit-card sized plastic card embedded with an integrated circuit chip that makes it "smart". It contains EEPROM (Electrically Erasable Programmable Read-Only Memory) a non-volatile memory. Since it is non-volatile it can store the data even if we remove the card from the reader. The data can be locked with a PIN - Personal Identification Number- which is 3 to 8 digit. However, if this information is to be transmitted by radio frequency or telephone lines, additional protection is necessary.

Contact Smart Cards have golden plates, contact pads, at one corner of the card. The plates are used to supply the necessary energy and to communicate via direct electrical contact with the reader. Smart cards that do not have a contact pad on their surface, for them the connection between the reader and the card is done via radio frequency (RF). They are having embedded antenna inside it.
